

ML 581: DEVELOPING YOUR LEARNING PLAN (4 units).

Mark Hopkins, Assistant Professor of Leadership

DESCRIPTION:

A global context requires leaders who understand reality beyond their respective national borders; accordingly, the formation and development of leadership must be reconceived. In this introductory course of the Master of Arts in Global Leadership, each (student) leader plays a significant role in their respective educational process as he or she develops a comprehensive learning plan for their entire degree program. Beyond individual learning, each leader experiences the benefits of both joining a diverse Christian community as well as enlisting in a like-minded group of practitioners in an online learning environment.

LEARNING OUTCOMES:

Upon successful completion of this course, the student will have:

- Performed a learning needs assessment in conjunction with the student's ministry community.
- Practiced various habits of spiritual formation and identify resources to facilitate leadership development.
- Performed tasks using online educational tools and methods.
- Experienced learning from church and mission leaders of the non-western world.
- Reviewed various monastic 'rules' and decide on a common way of living for the cohort group.
- Adopted a historically Christian perspective on leadership, practice, and learning.
- Designed a comprehensive learning plan for the student's Master of Arts program.

COURSE FORMAT:

The class will meet on the Internet using a 10-week lesson schedule aligned with Fuller's academic calendar. Each week students and the instructor will interact with course material through journaling, threaded discussions, and web-based research.
